A Look at Where Nebraska's Tax Receipts Come From

With governments throughout the country beset by lagging tax receipts, now seems like an appropriate time to look at where revenues come from in Nebraska.

According to a report issued by the Tax Foundation earlier this month, Nebraska's state and local governments rely heavily on property taxes – which should not come as surprise to anyone living in the state.

In fiscal year 2007, Nebraska governments collected more than 33 percent of their revenue from property tax, which includes residential and commercial real estate as well as personal property taxes on cars, boats, etc. Nebraska's rate ranked 16th in the nation.

On the flip side, Nebraska received only eight percent of its tax receipts from selective sales taxes, which ranked 46th among all state.

Selective sales taxes are those which are levied on items such as motor fuel, tobacco, insurance premiums, public utilities, amusements and alcoholic beverages.

The relatively low level of reliance on selective sales taxes as well as Nebraska's ranking of 23rd on dependence on general sales taxes (24 percent) has certainly played a large role in Nebraska faring somewhat better than most states during current economic struggles.

Nebraska received just three percent of its tax receipts from corporate income taxes in 2007, which was the 38th highest total and the Cornhusker State garnered eight percent of its receipts from licenses and other taxes, which ranks Nebraska as the 24th highest.
